Warily, Schools Watch Students on the Internet

John G. Palfrey Jr. of Phillips Academy said he was cautious about Internet tools that allowed too much surveillance of students.

SAN FRANCISCO — For years, a school principal’s job was to make sure students were not creating a ruckus in the hallways or smoking in the bathroom. Vigilance ended at the schoolhouse gates. (1)

1 ruckus: noun: a disturbance or commotion

2 vigilance: noun: the action or state of keeping careful watch for possible danger or difficulties
Now, as students complain, taunt\(^3\) and sometimes cry out for help on social media, educators have more opportunities to monitor students around the clock. And some schools are turning to technology to help them. Several companies offer services to filter and glean what students do on school networks; a few now offer automated tools to comb through off-campus postings for signs of danger. For school officials, this raises new questions about whether they should — or legally can — discipline children for their online outbursts. (2)

The problem has taken on new urgency\(^4\) with the case of a 12-year-old Florida girl who committed suicide after classmates relentlessly\(^5\) bullied her online and offline. (3)

Two girls — ages 12 and 14 — who the authorities contend were her chief tormentors\(^6\) were arrested this month after one posted a Facebook comment about her death. (4)

Educators find themselves needing to balance students’ free speech rights against the dangers children can get into at school and sometimes with the law because of what they say in posts on Facebook, Twitter and Tumblr. Courts have started to weigh in. (5)

In September, a federal appeals\(^7\) court in Nevada, for instance, sided with school officials who suspended a high school sophomore for threatening, through messages on Myspace, to shoot classmates. In 2011, an Indiana court ruled that school officials had violated the Constitution when they disciplined students for posting pictures on

“It is a concern and in some cases, a major problem for school districts,” said Daniel A. Domenech, executive director of the American Association of School Administrators\(^{10}\), which represents public school superintendents. (7)

Surveillance of students’ online speech, he said, can be cumbersome\(^{11}\) and confusing. “Is this something that a student has the right to do, or is this something that flies against the rules and regulations of a district?” (8)

Interviews with educators suggest that surveillance\(^{12}\) of students off campus is still mostly done the old-fashioned way, by relying on students to report trouble or following students on social networks. Tracking students on social media comes with its own risks: One principal in Missouri resigned last year after accusations\(^{13}\) that she had snooped on students using a fake Facebook account. “It was our children she was monitoring,” said one Twitter user who identified herself as Judy Rayford, after the news broke last year, without, she added, “authorization” from children or parents. But technology is catching on. (10)

In August, officials in Glendale, a suburb in Southern California, paid Geo Listening, a technology company, to comb through the social network posts of children in the district. The company said its service was not to pry 14, but to help the district, Glendale Unified, protect its students after suicides by teenagers in the area. (11)

Students mocked 15 the effort on Twitter, saying officials at G.U.S.D., the Glendale Unified School District, would not “even understand what I tweet most of the time, they should hire a high school slang analyst #shoutout2GUSD.” (12)

“We should be monitoring gusd instead,” one Twitter user wrote after an instructor was arrested on charges of sexual abuse; the instructor pleaded not guilty. (13)

Chris Frydrych, the chief executive of Geo Listening, based in Hermosa Beach, also in Southern California, declined to explain how his company’s technology worked, except to say that it was “a sprinkling of technology and a whole lot of human capital.” He said Geo Listening looked for keywords and sentiments on posts that could be viewed publicly. It cannot, for instance, read anyone’s Facebook posts that are designated for “friends” or “friends of friends.” (14)

But with Facebook’s announcement this month that teenagers will be permitted to post public status updates and images, Geo Listening and similar services will potentially have access to more information on that social network. (15)

Glendale has paid Geo Listening $40,500 to monitor the social media posts. Mr. Frydrych declined to say which other schools his company works with, except to predict that by the end of the year, his company would have signed up 3,000 schools. (16)

David Jones of CompuGuardian, based in Salt Lake City, said his product let school officials monitor whether students were researching topics like how to build bombs or discussing anorexia. His customers include five schools, but he, too, is optimistic about market growth. (17)

“It helps you boil down to what students are having what problems,” he said. “And then you can drill down.” (18)

But when does protecting children from each other or from themselves turn into chilling free speech? (19)

John G. Palfrey Jr., head of Phillips Academy in Massachusetts, said he favored a middle ground. He follows his students on Twitter if they follow him, for instance, but he is wary of automated tools that try to conduct what he called National Security Agency-style surveillance. (20)

He briefly contended with this question last year when students created a blog where they could anonymously share “secrets.” Many posts were on the fringe, Mr. Palfrey recalled, and some teachers and students were concerned that children’s identities could be determined from their writing patterns. The blog’s student founders were persuaded to add a note of caution, warning participants that their identities could be discovered. (21)

Mr. Palfrey offered an offline analogy. “We wouldn’t want to record every conversation they are having in the hallway,” he said. “The safety and well-being of our students is our top priority, but we also need for them to have the time and space to grow without feeling like we are watching their every move.” (22)

That fine line seems to be equally confounding\(^{19}\) the courts. (23)

In the Nevada case, a 16-year-old boy bragged on Myspace about having guns at home, and threatened to kill fellow students on a particular date. He also cited the 2007 massacre at Virginia Tech, in which a troubled student killed 32 people. (24)

The boy ended up spending 31 days in a local jail and was suspended from school for 90 days. He then sued the district, saying his free speech rights had been violated. (25)

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals dismissed the claim. It called his threats “alarming” and so specific that they presented “a real risk of significant disruption” to the school. Administrators were justified, the court ruled, for penalizing what was ostensibly\(^{20}\) off-campus speech. (26)

“It’s going to be more and more of legal issues,” said Gretchen Shipley, a lawyer who represents school districts. “The ability to monitor is growing so quickly.” (27)

The Indiana case offers a contrast. In the summer of 2009, two incoming 10th graders at Churubusco High School posted what the court called “raunchy\(^{21}\)” pictures of themselves. Once school officials found out, the girls were suspended from extracurricular activities for the school year. The girls sued, saying their free speech rights had been violated. The school contended that its student handbook bars conduct that could “discredit” or “dishonor” it. (28)

The court found that prohibition too broad. The students’ pictures, “juvenile” though they were, did not cause “substantial disruption” at school, the court ruled, and even though it was just “crude humor,” it

Answer the provided questions in complete sentences. Skip one line between each answer.

After writing answers to each question, write out which themes are addressed in the article. Underline each theme in your writing.

Skip one line and then write each vocabulary word, its part of speech, and its definition. Then go to the next line and write the vocabulary word into a complete sentence. Underline the vocabulary word in the sentence that you write and skip one line between each vocabulary entry.

Questions:

1. Do you think that because "educators have more opportunities to monitor students around the clock" that "school officials" should monitor "off-campus postings for signs of danger"? (2)

2. Identify the cause of "urgency" for school officials to monitor off-campus online activities. (3)

3. Identify what "[e]ducators find themselves needing to balance". (5)

4. Explain why "a federal appeals court in Nevada…sided with school officials who suspended a high school sophomore…" (6)

5. Explain why "an Indiana court ruled that school officials had violated the Constitution when they disciplined students…" (6)

6. Identify the organization "which represents public school superintendents." (7)

7. Explain the actions of "[o]ne principal in Missouri" that led to her resignation. (9)
8. Describe the work of "Geo Listening" as it is mentioned in paragraphs 11, 14, and 15.

9. Look at the amount of money that "Glendale [Unified School District] has paid Geo Listening." Multiply that amount by the number of schools that Geo Listening "predict[s]" will sign up for their services. In a complete sentence, write out the projected amount of money schools will pay for online surveillance. (16)

10. Identify another state and another surveillance company that are monitoring "whether students were researching topics like how to build bombs or discussing anorexia." (17)

11. Write out "Mr. Palfrey['s]" statement on the "safety and well-being" of students. (22)

12. What are the reasons the "Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals dismissed the claim...[that] free speech rights had been violated" for "a 16-year-old boy" in Nevada? (26, 24)

13. What are the reasons "[t]he Indiana case offers a contrast" to the Nevada case? (28, 29).
